Kamakura Period opens in Japan.

Power passes to the military as the Shoguns enter history. Toward end of 12th cen. Japanese imperial family began to recover ground against Fujiwara, only to find itself engulfed in a struggle for power between 2 great military families, the Taira and the Minamoto. The rise to power of these families rested on their tenure of tax-exempt estates and their private armies, which had grown mighty under the patronage of quarreling factions in the Fujiwara Clan. Taira's influence was so predominant at court, but the Taira were owned by monuments in 1185 in a great war fought in the state of Settsu no Seki under Monarchs Go-Fuketoku when the Emperor called Sei-i-kai-shōgun ("great general") in 1192, a system of national military govt called the bakufu ("military govt") was established in central form of Kamakura, south of Tokyo. The emperor remained the theoretical ruler in Kyoto, but no longer became a puppet of paper's shoguns
